Learning objectives Compare and contrast the ideas of ethnocentrism and cultural relativism. He describes the role Sir James Frazer and Sir E. B. Tylor played in defining the concept of culture in anthropology. Identify the differences between the anthropology of the armchairs and the observation work of the participants and explain how Bronislaw Malinowski contributed to the development of anthropological techniques of work on the ground. Identify the contributions that Franz Boas and his students made for the development of new theories about culture. Evaluate some of the ethical issues that may arise from anthropological research. Do you think culture can be studied in a cafeteria? Have you ever gone to a cafeteria, sat down with a book or a laptop, and heard conversations around you? If you just answered yes, somehow, you were acting as an anthropologist. Anthropologists like to be part of their environment, observe and participate with people doing everyday things. As two anthropologists writing a chapter on the concept of culture, we wanted to know what other people thought about culture. What better place to meet than in our community cafe? Our little coffee shop was full of aroma of coffee beans, and people's voices competed with the sound of coffee grinding. At the counter, a board listed the daily special sandwiches and desserts. (The coffee shops have their own language, with vocabulary like macchiato and latte. It may feel like entering a foreign culture.) We found a quiet corner that would allow us to observe other people (and, hopefully, identify some with whom to interact) without disturbing them too much with our conversation. We understand the way anthropologists think about culture, but we also wondered what it might be.What to say the people who are sitting around us. Was it a definition of culture really means something for the average coffee pattern? It is a definition definition ♪♪ ♪♪ ♪♪
